Major Area of Research Interest

I possess a comprehensive background in public health, with specialized training and expertise in medical nutrition therapy, the prevention and management of lifestyle-related diseases, and the social and structural determinants of health. Informed by my background as a practitioner, my research focuses on community engagement science and the prevention of lifestyle-related diseases, particularly among under-resourced urban populations, with an emphasis on understanding and addressing the social and structural factors that contribute to health disparities. Additionally, my expertise encompasses both qualitative and quantitative research methodologies, enabling a nuanced investigation of the complex social and structural determinants that influence health outcomes.
